The Duke of Holſtein had alſo left Moſcow to follow the Czar to Petersbourg, where the two Princes of Heſſe-Hombourg are arrived: It was rumoured the Czar deſigned to give one of the Princeſſes his Daughters in Marriage to one of thoſe Princes, and his Niece the Dutcheſs of Courland to the other. His Czarian Majeſty has given to Prince Dolhorucky, formerly his Ambaſſadour at the Court of France, the Palace of Baron Schaffirof at Petersbourg; it was not yet known who would ſucceed that Baron in the Employment of Vice-Chancellour, but it was the general Expectation it would be M. Oſterman. It is adviſed from Petersbourg, that ſerviceable Seamen were much wanted for the Men of War the Czar had ordered to be fitted out there. Thoſe of the Officers and Seamen who are Foreigners, were deſirous to quit the Czar's Service, becauſe they are not paid regularly and were alſo diſſatisfied on other Accounts; but his Czariſh Majeſty had cauſed Proclamations to be publiſhed, forbidding rigorouſly the ſuffering any Perſon to go out of his Dominions without a Paſſport ſigned with his own Hand.
